Vitamin D in kidney and bone disease. 1,25-Dihydroxyvitamin D is an active metabolite of vitamin D whose production is regulated by serum phosphate, PTH, and dietary phosphate, calcium, and vitamin D intakes. 1,25-Dihydroxyvitamin D is the primary regulator of PTH secretion, and its concentration is the principal determinant of kidney calcium reabsorption. 1,25-Dihydroxyvitamin D is also an essential factor for normal mineralization of the skeleton in both fetal life and in adulthood. Thus, an appropriate 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D concentration is essential for renal phosphate reabsorption, bone mineralization, and growth. Vitamin D receptor activation by 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D is a prerequisite for the biological action of 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D. The vitamin D receptor exists in extrarenal tissues, including the cartilage, muscle, and vascular smooth muscle, and its activation causes cell proliferation. Serum vitamin D status is quantified by measurement of serum 25-hydroxyvitamin D, the 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D precursor. The concentration of 25-hydroxyvitamin D is normally regulated by dietary phosphate intake and is maximally raised by sunlight. The low level of 25-hydroxyvitamin D seen in the majority of older subjects with osteomalacia is caused by intestinal malabsorption of 25-hydroxyvitamin D, loss of the vitamin D receptor in the intestine, and failure of 1 alpha-hydroxylase to synthesize 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D in the kidney. Treatment of osteomalacia consists of supplementation with 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D.⁸

to the case at bar, if a stranger makes a statement to you, offering to sell you gold or silver, and you rely on it, you are guilty of the same offense as if you had bought the article. If they will not make out a prima facie case, the next issue to raise is whether you will give any evidence of your own. This is also a matter of the interests of the others. If they have a prima facie case, or an appearance of such a case, and will not give evidence, you have every right to not give evidence yourself, and to raise the question of self-defense, even though you may not have much of that defense. The rule is that a defendant in a criminal case may not be compelled to testify in his own behalf, nor to introduce evidence if he so desires. In the case at bar, the defendants would not have been allowed to introduce any evidence without violating that rule. The defendants having exercised their right not to take the stand in their own behalf, the state may not offer testimony to rebut their statement. The only evidence that the state could offer would be that of the owner of the coal mine. The state argues that the coal mine owner, if called to the stand, would have testified that the defendants offered to sell him gold and silver. If the defendants were called to testify, they would deny having made such an offer. Such evidence would be hearsay. However, the state may not call any witness to testify to the truth of the defendants' statement. They may show what they have been told, but they cannot call the informant to swear as to the truth of the statement. If the state calls the informant to testify as to what the defendants told him, the defendants would have the right of cross-examination, and to contradict or impeach his statements by the fact that they deny having made such an offer, or that they refused to make an investigation of the mine. Such evidence would be admissible. In the case at bar, the question of a prima facie case should not be decided by the court as a matter of law. It is a question to be decided by the jury, and the state has no right to offer any testimony as to the truth of the statement without violating the defendants' rights by calling a person as a witness who is at liberty and was not called by the defendants, and is not here to be questioned by the defendants or their counsel. The trial court erred in not
