

The technology provides a new gameplay experience where all players on the pitch are immediately evident to the player. The data also allows us to create authentic animations at a higher level of fidelity, so that players' actions feel more realistic. On top of this, we can use the position of players on the pitch and their body shape to create amazing new interactive animations. In the past we have seen the introduction of other technologies, such as the Quick Kick engine, and the introduction of new ways of thinking and creating, such as the "Play the Ball" moment, and it remains the same for FIFA 22. Our aim is for a richer and more realistic soccer experience that is not only entertaining, but that is also fair and playable across all platforms. While we have already introduced unique animations for specific skill sets and player movements, this new technology allows us to explore and show even more behaviours. This is something that we have never had the opportunity to do before, and we hope that the combination of it being highly accurate and completely dynamic opens up many new gameplay experiences for us. While we're at it, we can also allow players to re-create animations for new skills and movements. An example would be the celebration animation for goal-scoring, where we can have players fall over in the most effective way. You may have been seeing in some of the FIFA 'Energised' animations that we use in the game. We can also have players create animations such as cycling while sprinting and dynamic animations such as players reaching for shots that they just missed. We use this animation to enhance the experience where we feel it adds value. We can then show these new animations in all modes of play, as well as during gameplay.
